Remy chased his favorite ball across the field after his human, Matthew, threw it. He scooped up the ball in his beagle jaws. He raced back toward Matthew. His tail wagged wildly as he dropped the ball at Matthew's feet. "You love this game, don't you, boy?" Matthew launched the ball across the field again. Remy took off after it. The ball bounced into the woods and out of sight. Remy slapped his nose to the ground. He searched for the ball with his sense of smell instead. He found it in a patch of leaves. He was relieved he hadn't lost the ball, and the fetch game could continue.

Warning
I watched a horse gallop out of the morning fog toward our cabin. A girl sat atop the horse. Her red hair streamed behind her like a warning flag. Her woolen cloak billowed about her. "The Redcoats are marching this way!" she cried. "Tell everyone!" I had not expected her to speak. She seemed more like a ghost than reality. "Go, now!" she yelled. As she galloped away, I ran to our cabin and shouted her
