Diego couldn't believe his abuela had moved so far away. He was used to seeing his grandmother every day. He plodded to the soccer field for his game. His heart hurt knowing his abuela wouldn't be there to cheer him on today.
"What's the matter?" his soccer coach asked him. "You look like a deflated balloon, Diego."
Diego and Coach Mark had a good rapport, so Diego decided to tell him the truth. "My grandmother moved and I miss her." He gestured to the field. "She loved coming to these games."
"I'm sorry your grandmother moved," Coach Mark said, "but my son is recording today's game. We can send it to her if you'd like."
"Yes, please!" Diego now had a reason to play his best game ever.

Emily clapped until her palms burned. The rock concert had been her first and the entire experience had been life-changing. Being among other fans had filled her with an energy that even now still pulsed through her veins. The lights and fog and video accompanying the performance had added another level of entertainment that was a visual masterpiece. Knowing her favorite musicians were right there on the stage had been like a fantasy come true.
"So what did you think?" her friend, Alisha, asked as they shuffled out of the aisle and joined the line of people leaving the theater.
Emily let out a little squeal with what was left of her voice. She'd sung along with every song the band had played and worn her throat out. "I wish I could rewind and enjoy it all over again."
