CEMPASÚCHIL

Read this Aztec legend to learn how marigolds became the flowers of Día de los Muertos.

Xóchitl and Huitzilin were two young Aztec children. They were the best of friends, always playing and exploring their town. Over the years, a great love began to grow between Xóchitl and Huitzilin.

One of the pair's favorite things to do was hike to the top of a nearby mountain. They would offer flowers to the Sun god Tonatiuh. The Sun god appreciated their offerings and smiled from the sky, beaming warm rays on Xóchitl and Huitzilin. One day on the mountain, the two professed their love and promised it would last forever.

Soon after, war broke out in the city. Huitzilin left to fight and protect their homeland, leaving Xóchitl alone. Later, dreaded news of Huitzilin's death came. Xóchitl's heart was shattered. Xóchitl walked one last time to the top of the mountain. She begged the sun god Tonatiugh to allow her to join her love Huitzilin. The girl's prayers moved Tonatiugh, so he cast a ray that gently touched Xóchitl's cheek. She was instantly turned into a beautiful flower that was as fiery and bright as the sun's rays.

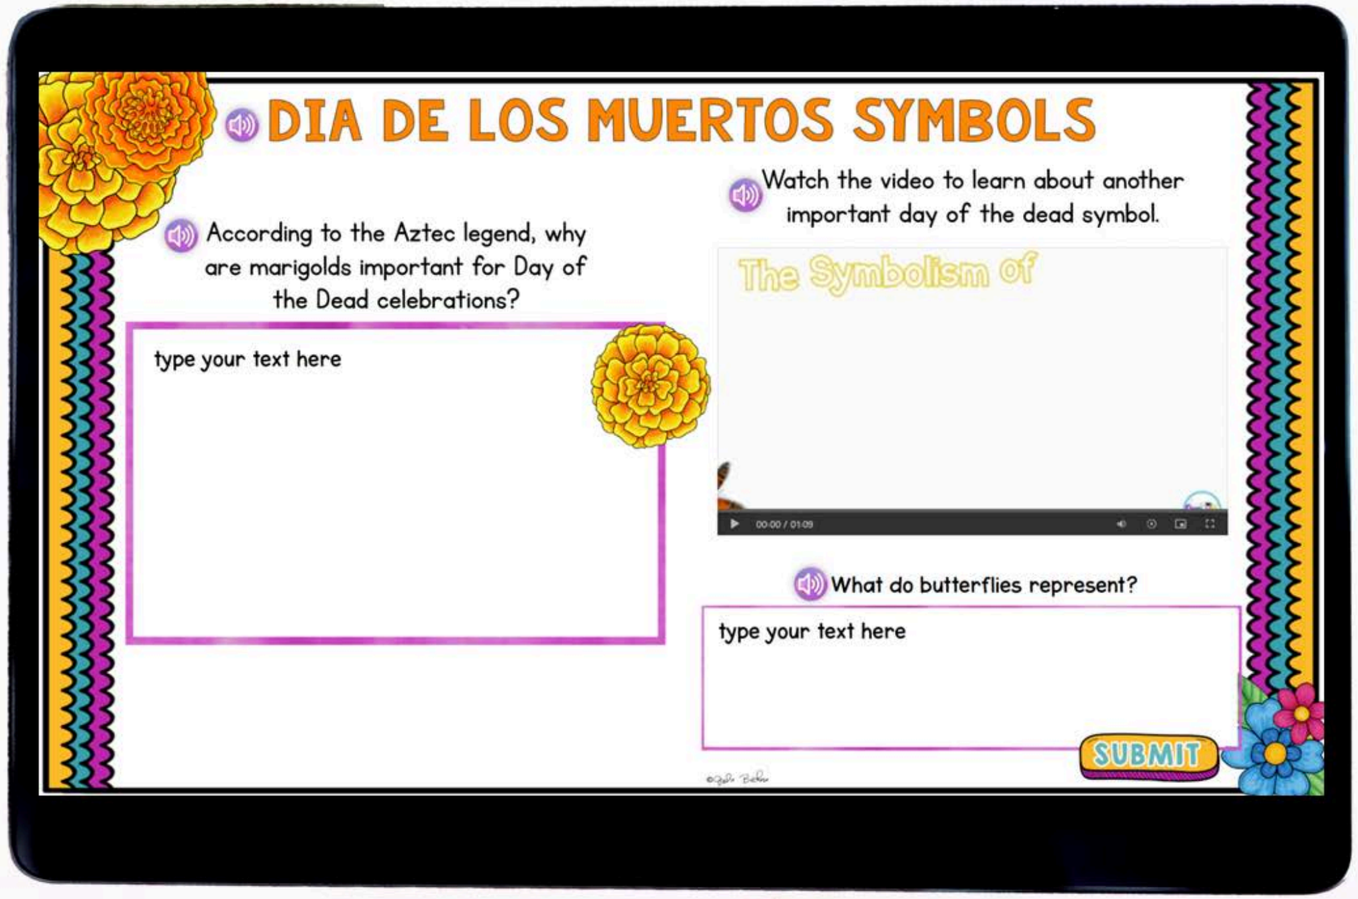

A hummingbird approached and gingerly touched the center of the flower with its beak. It was Huitzilin, reborn as a hummingbird. The flower spread its 20 petals and released a lovely scent.

Xóchitl and Huitzilin would be together as long as cempasuchil flowers and hummingbirds existed on earth.

This is how the cempasúchil flower came to be the Day of the Dead Flower.
